In this paper, I will be studying the differences between the usages of social words such as \textit{please} and \textit{thank you} in child and child-directed speech. From the data I have collected from the CHILDES database, and from prior literature, it seems plausible that children learn the usage of these words from their parents. In fact, my hypothesis is that the child directly mimics the mother or father in their usages of specific words. In this paper, I will go through my different sets of data to test whether the children just mimic adult usage until they receive explicit instruction in the use of polite words.
